More than ten thousand persons spathered for the socialistic demonstration. The socialist leaders, it was said, had pledged their word that no untoward incidents would occur. The authorities believed the absence of police and carabineers from the scene would aid in avoiding trouble.

The socialists held their mass meeting in the Communal Theater, which was decorated with red flags. While the meeting was in full swing six hundred nationalists in military formation issued from their quarters near the Communal Theater, intending to carry out a parade through the streets and to sing war songs and shout the war cry of Gabriele d'Annunzio. At first the na-tionalists were confronted by male nurses from the lunatic asylum. These nurses, all socialists, marched in the opposite direction to the nationalists, vaving red flags.

Then a volley of rifle fire swept over the nationalists, the shots coming from the battlements of a famous neighboring medieval castle. castle, which was the seat of the so-cialist provincial council, had been occupied from early morning by red guards, who had come there from various parts of the province to be ready for any contingency.

When the firing began there was great excitement, a stampede of the people immediately followed. During the shooting, which continued only a few minutes, the screams of the hor-ror-stricken people could be heard above the volleys from the rifles. When order finally was restored the troops rushed into the castle and took into custody fifteen persons, but the others who had been inside had

Among those arrested were the so-cialist provincial councilor, Filippo Luchesi, who is said to have been among those who pledged their word to the authorities that no red guards would be allowed inside the castle and that no arms would be hidden there. After the trouble, empty cartridges were found all along the bat-tlements, while rifles and revolvers were thrown into the most below.

The dead include former Lieut Francisco Gozzi and Natralino Magnani, both nationalist leaders; Gioanni Mirella, an attendant at the asylum, and a laborer.
